INTRODUCTION TO THE MACHINE AGE

The American Miller and his Mill, though all but forgotten, had an important and distinct place in the fabric of American History

The first roads, in pioneer areas where only paths existed, were built to the mills. The Miller was a builder, banker, businessman, host and the first industrial inventor in America. Wherever mills were built towns soon grew up around them, for they were the hub of all activity. Throughout the country there still exist so many such towns, the Milldales, Milltowns, Millvilles, Milfords, etc., that even the postoffice departments find it confusing. All these towns were built around mills that are now forgotten.

The Miller was a fearless, hardy individual, for the mills were dangerous and the life of a careless miller short. Except for a few restored mills, the typical miller and his mill are now extinct. But the water-wheeled mill still is in use in hidden glades throughout the country, doing its chores as though time had stood still and progress had never come to the land.
